S Science

According to the American Diabetic Association, the number of overweight Americans has reached epidemic proportions and health care costs associated with weight-related concerns have escalated. In addition, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention recently announced a study noting that "from 1999 to 2000, the number of overweight adults rose from 56 percent to 65 percent of the population."

The American Obesity Association reports that weight-related healthcare costs more than $100 billion a year in the United States. Despite the rise of the $40 billion weight loss industry, many people continue eating too much high-calorie food and not getting enough physical activity.

The good news is that even moderate weight loss—as little as 10 or 20 pounds—can improve a person's health if the weight isn't gained back. Clearly, keeping our weight within healthy levels is not just a cosmetic issue; it's a matter of good health.
